A Note on Sensitive Spiritual Concepts. This book discusses spiritual concepts of life, death, and the soul as taught within the Sanatan Dharm tradition. References to Iccha Mrityu — the yogic concept of conscious departure from the body — describe a rare spiritual siddhi attained only by highly realised souls in the earliest ages of creation. It is not a method, technique, or recommendation for the reader to attempt. This book does not promote, encourage, or instruct any form of self-harm, suicide, euthanasia, or premature death. The teachings presented here are philosophical reflections meant solely to deepen the reader's understanding of the eternal nature of the soul.

If you or someone you know is experiencing thoughts of self-harm or emotional distress, please seek immediate help from a qualified mental health professional. Compassionate support is available, and reaching out is always the right step.

About Bapuji

Bapuji — full name Bapuji Dashrathbhai Patel, also lovingly called “Dadaji” by the younger generation — was born in 1956 in the small village of Akhaj in the Mehsana district of Gujarat. He spent his childhood in another village named Ambasan, also located in the Mehsana district.

In the early part of his life, he was a highly successful lawyer. Later, he devoted his life to realising the supreme spiritual truth and bringing this divine knowledge forward for the welfare of humanity. Today, this supreme knowledge serves as a guiding light for true seekers to realise their ultimate destiny. It is a blessing of the highest divinity that the present time is witnessing the rise of this supreme spiritual knowledge, guiding souls on Earth to return to their original source.

Despite being raised in a very poor family and facing challenging circumstances, Bapuji had a deep desire to transform this sorrowful and suffering world into a better place. At the young age of six, he questioned God repeatedly, asking why God remained silent about the suffering of humanity. This intense longing to end human suffering eventually led him to attain the highest level of spirituality later in life.

Even as a child, Bapuji would spend hours alone in the fields, often neglecting his own comfort. Due to poverty, he would walk barefoot, frequently getting pricked by thorns. Many times, he would stay late in the fields and, on his way back home, encounter subtle world entities. These experiences sparked his interest in communicating with subtle world souls.

Bapuji was courageous from a young age, which helped him overcome many obstacles. Alongside his studies in chartered accountancy, he gave tuition classes to support himself financially. Later, he completed his Bachelor of Law degree and became a well-known lawyer in Ahmedabad.

In 1997, he established a spiritual institution called “Vishwa Parivartak Ishwariya Vidhyalay” in Chenpur, Ahmedabad, with the mission of transforming this mortal world, filled with suffering and disorder, into an eternal divine world of immortality. Smt. Sushma Tandon, lovingly known as “Maa,” worked alongside Bapuji in this grand divine mission.

To accomplish this mission, Bapuji worked tirelessly, dedicating all his resources to this divine purpose. During that time, he would deliver continuous spiritual discourses for up to eighteen hours without rest. In these discourses, he explained the highest dimensions of divine knowledge, which he realised through deep meditation and divine vision in a state of superconsciousness. This knowledge goes beyond the imagination of the ordinary human mind.

Bapuji's teachings cover a vast range of topics, including the types of celestial creators across different dimensions, the creation of our solar system, galaxy, and universe, and most importantly, the transcendental knowledge of the multiverse and realities beyond it. His knowledge is supremely profound and is intended for highly evolved seekers, referred to as “behad souls.” According to Bapuji, these behad souls will play a key role in transforming this mortal world into an eternal divine realm.

At present, Bapuji remains deeply engaged in intense meditation and samadhi for long hours. He does not meet anyone, as he is continuously immersed in his transcendental mission in a superconscious state.

— by Bapuji Dashrathbhai Patel

Of all the questions that have moved the human heart, none has carried the weight of this one: What is death? Why does it come? Who created it?

For ages, every tradition has tried to answer this in its own way. The scriptures of Sanatan Dharm tell of a time when Brahma had to create death because the earth had grown too heavy with souls and negativity had begun to rise. It is a story familiar to many. But what stands behind this story? What truly happened in the unseen depths of creation that made death necessary at all?

This book gathers the answer in the words of Bapuji Dashrathbhai Patel. Drawing from his divine vision, Bapuji takes the reader gently back — through the formation of the first creation, through the descent of param purush and param prakriti, through the slow loss of soul power, and finally to the moment when Yamraj, Yamllok, and the system of forced death came into being.

The teaching here is precise. Death is not the original truth. Death was created. The soul itself is immortal — it was always so, and it remains so. Only the body dies. Only the mechanism of forced separation came later, when souls forgot how to leave the body on their own.

The book has been arranged simply, for any reader. There is no need for prior knowledge of spirituality. Each chapter builds upon the last, in the same gentle way Bapuji himself unfolds the truth. Read it slowly. Sit with each idea. The aim is not information; it is recognition — the quiet inner recognition that you are not the body, that death has a beginning and therefore an end, and that the soul has always belonged to a far older, far higher home.

May this book serve as a small lamp on that journey back.

Chapter One The Eternal Question: What Is Death?

Of all the mysteries that follow a human being from birth to old age, none returns with such persistence as the mystery of death. We see it in others. We feel it in our fear. And yet when we ask plainly — what is death, and why does it exist — the answer rarely comes.

The ancient scriptures of Bharat carry one telling of this story. They say that there came a time on earth when the population had grown vast, and a heaviness began to settle upon the planet. With this heaviness came negativity. The earth could no longer bear what was building upon it. It is then, the scriptures say, that Brahma had to create death.

This is one telling. Bapuji places this telling within a much wider truth. The story is correct in its outline. Death was indeed created. But behind this single sentence lies an entire history — of how creation came down from its purest form, of how souls who once moved freely between higher worlds slowly lost that power, and of how a system had to be put in place when souls could no longer leave their bodies on their own.

To understand the birth of death, one has to first see what existed before death. One has to see the original creation — the world that knew no death because there was no need for it.

This is where Bapuji begins.

◆ Bapuji Insight

"Mrityu nahin thi kyunki mrityu ka sarjan nahin tha."

"Death did not exist, because death had not yet been created."

Chapter Two The Origin of Creation

Before any question of death can be answered, a single thread must be followed — the thread of creation itself. Bapuji begins from the very beginning, from the formless source and traces in a few clear steps how this entire universe came into being.

At the origin stands Shiv Nirakar — the formless supreme. From this formless Shiv arose Shiv Akari, the Shiv with form. From this Akari Shiv emerged Shakti. Together, Shiv and Shakti gave rise to Vishnu. And from the navel of Vishnu emerged Brahma.

This is the lineage of creation. It is not a metaphor. Bapuji explains that he has personally witnessed this in his yog — going back across vast spans of time and seeing each stage clearly. Whatever the scriptures of Sanatan Dharm describe regarding this origin, he affirms as accurate. Shiv Nirakar to Shiv Akari, then Shakti, then Vishnu, then Brahma — this entire sequence, he says, is exactly so.

Brahma, having emerged, then began the next phase of creation. Through sankalp — the power of pure thought, the power of resolve — Brahma created the first beings of this world. He brought forth seventy param purush, and seven lokas. These were the first creations, and they were not made of flesh and bone as we know bodies today. Their souls were of param prakash — supreme divine light. Their bodies were of param tatva — supreme elements. Param Vayu, Param Agni, Param Akash. The original creation was made entirely of light and supreme elements.

Each param purush then created his param prakriti — his divine feminine counterpart — from within himself. This is the same pattern Vishnu followed when he brought forth Lakshmi from his own arm. The divine masculine and the divine feminine, together, became the foundation of the creation that followed.

This was the beginning. Not a world of bodies, not a world of earth and water, but a world of light and supreme elements. A world held together by sankalp. A world without weight, without burden, and without death.

◆ Bapuji Insight

"Pehle jo brahmand bana, vo to param tattvon ka tha. Jinko hum farishta kahenge."

"The brahmand that was first created was made of supreme elements. Those beings, we would call them angels."

Chapter Three

The First World, Without Death

To understand how vast a span of time we are speaking of, Bapuji gives an outline of the cosmic clock as described in the Sanatan Dharm tradition and as revealed to him through his own yogic vision.

One year of Brahma is equal to thirty-one kharab, ten arab, and forty crore years of earth time (3.1014 trillion). Brahma's complete lifespan is one hundred such years. This brahmand of ours has been in existence for about sixteen hundred kharab years (160 trillion). The earth, within this brahmand, has been in existence for around fifteen hundred and fifty kharab years — Brahma's age at present being roughly fifty years.

These numbers are vast. They are mentioned not for memorisation, but to show that the present age of the world is only a small chapter in a story that stretches across unimaginable time.

In the very early portion of this creation, when only ten of Brahma years had passed, no human beings existed on earth. The earth itself had not yet taken its present form. There was no soil-world, no body of mud and water. The first brahmand was a param tatva world — a creation of supreme elements. The beings of this world were what we would call farishta, angel-like beings.

There was no death in this world. Not because death had been conquered, but because death had not been created. There was no need for it. The beings of this realm did not require any system to leave their bodies, because their existence was held in light and in supreme elements, far above the heaviness that brings the body to its end.

From this param tatva world, creation slowly stepped down. The beings called devta — the gods of the higher realms above Vishnu's loka — existed in three elements: akash (ether), vayu (air), and agni (fire). Above them remained the param tatva world. Below them, gradually, the path of descent opened.

This is a point worth pausing upon. In the original arrangement, the higher beings did not die. The angels did not die. The early devtas did not die in the way we know death today. The body composition was light. The soul's power was vast. The need for a forced ending of life had not arisen.

It is from this peaceful, deathless world that the long descent began. And it is in that descent that the first conditions for the birth of death were quietly being laid.

Chapter Four

The Descent: From Param Tatva to Five Elements

Creation does not stand still. It moves. Bapuji describes this movement is a slow descent — from the highest, finest elements toward the heavier and the more visible gross elements

From the param tatva world, the beings began to step down into the world of three elements. From there, the descent continued into five elements. The composition shifted. What once was a body of divine ether (param akash), divine air (param vayu) and divine fire (param agni) gradually took on gross ether, air, fire, water and earth.

Brahma then created the earth — at first only a light, gentle earth. The sun was created next, and even the sun in its early form was different from what we know today. It was radiating param prakash, supreme light, and param agni, supreme fire. The sun moved around the earth in those days. The world that came into being upon this newly formed earth was still a luminous world.

Onto this earth, the devta began to descend. They moved from three elements into five elements. They moved from avyakt — the unmanifest, subtle form — into vyakt — the manifest, visible form. Step by step, they entered the human form.

And here is the heart of this stage. When humans first came into being on earth, even though their forms had taken shape, death still had not been created. The first humans did not die in the manner we now know. The reason was simple — they did not need to.

Their body composition was unlike ours. The very first being created on earth, the original param purush with his param prakriti, carried a body that was one hundred percent param tatva — Param Akash, Param Vayu, Param Agni. The devta who came down from above carried slightly less, with three elements added. As the descent continued, humans began to carry only a small portion of param tatva deep inside, with three elements above that, and finally two outer elements — water and earth.

This last layer — the outer covering of water and earth — was very thin in those early humans. The body was light. The soul, with all its strength, could still operate freely without being weighed down.

During the first ten years of Brahma's age, there were no humans at all on earth, and so there was no death. In the next ten years, this gentle procedure of descent continued. Even at the end of twenty years of Brahma, death had still not been created. Earth was peaceful. The body was light. The soul retained its power.

It was only after Brahma's twentieth year that the proportion of param tatva in the human body fell to zero. Only the three subtle elements and the five gross elements remained. Earth's water and soil began to grow heavier. The body grew dense. From this point on, gradually, Satyug, Treta, Dwapar, and Kalyug began to take their shape. Before this stage, even these yug cycles, as we know them now, had not begun.

The descent had reached the point where the body had become heavy enough to hold the soul against its will. And it is from this point that the seed of death was being silently planted.

◆ Bapuji Insight

"Manushya bani, magar mrityu nahin thi kyunki mrityu ka sarjan nahin tha."

"Humans were formed, but death did not exist — because death had not been created."

Chapter Five

Iccha Mrityu: The Divine Capacity of the Original Souls

In the original creation, the divine beings of light possessed a spiritual capacity that has long been lost to humanity. Bapuji places this truth before us, and it deserves to be received slowly — not as a method to be attempted, but as a description of what once was, in beings whose souls were of supreme spiritual power.

A note for the reader: The capacity known as Iccha Mrityu is a yogic siddhi described in the Sanatan Dharm scriptures — a divine power granted only to beings of the very highest spiritual realisation, and only in the earliest ages of creation. It is not a technique, not a practice, and not something that can be attempted by any modern human. This chapter describes a spiritual state that existed in the very early ages of creation. It is shared here purely for the reader's understanding of how the soul once functioned in its original divine purity, before the rise of the body's grip upon it.

In the early stages of human existence, the soul carried tremendous power. The body, being light, did not bind the soul. The outer covering of water and earth was thin. The param tatva presence within the body was still meaningful. In such a state, the soul was free.

This freedom expressed itself in a beautiful way. When such a highly evolved divine soul was ready to return to its higher loka, it would simply form a sankalp — a conscious resolve — and depart. There was no struggle. There was no agent of death pulling the soul out. The soul itself, by the strength of its own will, would shed the body and rise.

This is what is called Iccha Mrityu — voluntary, willed departure from the body, attained only by divine beings of supreme spiritual power. It is not death as we know it. It is a quiet return — possible only because those souls existed in a state of divine purity that no being in our present age possesses.

Where would such a soul go? Bapuji explains that they would move upward — from the world of five elements into the world of three elements, and from there even higher into the param tatva world. They could travel between lokas — the second loka, the third loka, the fourth loka — and choose where to settle.

The body did not hold them back. Their soul had the power; therefore, the body had the power to follow the soul's command. There was no force needed to separate the two. The soul, by its own readiness, withdrew itself.

This was the natural order. This was the original arrangement of life on earth. In such a world, the question of who created death would have made no sense at all — for death itself did not exist.

But this freedom was not destined to last. The very descent that had carried souls into bodies was, even now, weakening their power. The thinning of soul-strength was already underway.

◆ Bapuji Insight

"Iccha Mrityu tha. Atma mein shakti thi, isliye jab chahe vo upar chale jaate the."

"There was Iccha Mrityu. The soul had power, and so whenever it wished, it could rise upward."

Chapter Six The Decline of Soul Power

As long as the soul retained its power, the body remained obedient to it. As long as the body was light, the soul could move freely. But Bapuji explains that this balance, beautiful as it was, gradually began to shift.

With each step of descent, soul power began to thin. The reason lay in the very nature of creation. Each time a soul exercises its sankalp, each time it engages with the surroundings of a denser world, a portion of its energy is spent. Across countless interactions, across long stretches of time, this expenditure showed itself.

The soul's nature went through a slow change. From its original satopradhan state — pure, peaceful, luminous — it moved into rajopradhan, a state of activity and acquisition. From there it descended further into tamopradhan, a state of darkness and ignorance.

As the soul became tamopradhan, its grip on the body changed. Where once the soul commanded the body and could leave at will, now the body began to grip the soul. The covering of water and earth grew denser. Attachment to the physical form took root. The soul, weakened, was no longer able to perform the simple act it had once done so naturally — withdraw itself.

This is what Bapuji calls the rise of moh — attachment to the body. With moh came along resistance. The soul, even when its time on earth was complete, no longer wished to leave. And even if it did wish to leave, it no longer knew how. The very freedom that had defined the early human had now slipped away. The soul that once moved between lokas as easily as we walk between rooms now found itself unable to step out of one body.

And here a serious problem arose. The body, no matter how dense, has a natural limit to how long it can sustain itself. The soul, no matter how forgetful of its origin, was not meant to be permanently bound to a single physical form. Yet the means of departure — the soul's own conscious withdrawal — was no longer available.

The earth was slowly filling with souls who could not leave. Population on the planet kept rising. Heaviness spread. Negativity, born of bondage and attachment, began to take hold of the atmosphere itself. Something had to be done. The original deathless arrangement could not be sustained any longer. A new system had to be established.

This is the moment when death itself was created.

Chapter Seven The Birth of Death

So we arrive at the heart of this book. Death was not always present in creation. Death was created — at a specific point, for a specific reason, by a specific creator. Bapuji explains the situation that made it necessary. As soul power declined, as bodies grew heavier, as moh (attachment to the body) deepened, three things began to occur at once.

First, souls who came to earth could no longer return. They had descended into bodies, and the path back upward was now closed to them by their own loss of power. They could not die — for there was no system of death — and they could not leave by will.

Second, the population of earth grew. With every birth, another soul was added; with no exit possible, none of them left. The earth slowly began to bear more than it could carry.

Third, the very atmosphere of earth began to change. With heaviness came imbalance. With imbalance came rising negativity. Earth itself was becoming destabilised. The five elements were losing their natural rhythm.

In such a situation, the original arrangement could not continue. The creator had to act. Brahma, who had brought forth the early creation through sankalp, now turned his attention to this new requirement.

And so death was created. Mrityu (Death) came into being not as a part of the original truth, but as a corrective system — a means by which souls who could no longer leave their bodies on their own would still be able to depart, even if by force.

This is the central teaching of this entire book, and it is worth holding onto. Death is not the original truth of creation. Death is a system. It was put in place to address a specific problem — the problem of souls being unable to leave bodies they were no longer fit to inhabit. Once the soul's freedom was gone, a new arrangement had to take its place. That new arrangement is what we now call death.

With the creation of death came the creation of those who would carry it out. A new realm was needed. A new lord was needed. A new order of messengers was needed. And a system of accounting was needed — for the actions of each soul during its time on earth could no longer simply be left to it. The whole framework had to be built. And it was.

♦ Bapuji Insight

"Atma mein shakti khatam hoti gayi, atma tamopradhan banti gayi. Tab Brahma ne Yamraj ki, Yamlok ki sthapna ki."

"Soul power gradually came to an end, the soul became tamopradhan. Then Brahma established Yamraj and Yamlok."

Chapter Eight The Establishment of Yamraj and Yamlok

Once the need for death was clear, Brahma established the system that would carry it out. Bapuji describes the structure plainly. Yamraj — the lord of death — was created. Yamlok — the realm where souls would be brought after the body's end — was established. And to carry out the actual act of separation, Yamdoots — the messengers of Yamraj — were appointed.

The work of these Yamdoots was direct. They would be sent down to earth. When a soul's time in a body was complete, but the soul itself was unwilling or unable to depart, the Yamdoots would pull the soul out by force. They would extract it from the body and bring it to Yamlok.

It is important to grasp what Bapuji is saying here. The forceful nature of death is not natural to the soul. The pulling out, the wrenching apart of body and soul — this is the consequence of the soul having lost its own ability to leave. In the original arrangement, no such force was needed. The soul departed by its own resolve. Now, because the resolve was gone and yet the body still had to release the soul, force became the means.

This explains, in a single insight, much of what humanity feels around death. The fear of death, the resistance, the suffering at the moment of separation — none of this belongs to the soul's true nature. It belongs to a soul that has forgotten how to leave on its own and is being made to leave anyway.

Once a soul reached Yamlok, a new question arose. What was to be done with it? It could not simply be sent back to wander. A judgement was needed — an account of what the soul had done during its time in the body, an evaluation of what it had earned and what it had lost.

For this purpose, another figure was created.

Chapter Nine

Chitragupt and the System of Karma

To handle the accounts of every soul that arrived in Yamlok, Brahma created Chitragupt — the cosmic accountant. Chitragupt's task was to maintain the record of every soul's karma, every action, every consequence.

Bapuji speaks of Chitragupt's chaupde — his ledgers — where the record of each soul was kept. Nothing was lost. Nothing was forgotten. When a soul arrived in Yamlok, its account was opened and read. The good actions were tallied. The bad actions were tallied. The judgement followed from this account.

Two further realms were now needed. For the souls whose accounts spoke well of them, an upper realm — Swarg, heaven — would receive them and offer the fruits of their good deeds. For the souls whose accounts were heavy with wrong actions, a lower realm — Narak, hell — was created, where the consequences of their actions would be experienced.

In this way, the entire framework took shape. Brahma had set up not just death itself, but the supporting structure that would govern what happened to a soul after death. Yamraj at the head. Yamdoots as the agents of separation. Chitragupt as the keeper of records. Swarg and Narak as the realms of reward and punishment.

This whole arrangement, Bapuji reminds us, came into being only after souls had lost the ability to act freely. None of this was needed in the original world. None of this existed in the param tatva creation. None of this had any role when souls departed by their own sankalp. The entire architecture of death — its lord, its messengers, its accountant, its heaven, its hell — is the architecture of a fallen state, not the architecture of original truth.

Understanding this is itself a kind of liberation. The soul, in its original nature, has nothing to do with this system. The system was built around the body and around the consequences of bondage to the body. The soul itself, in its true state, is far above all of this.

Chapter Ten

Death Across the Yugas

Bapuji draws a careful line through the four yugas — Satyug, Treta, Dwapar, and Kalyug — to show how death itself has changed across these ages.

In Satyug, the role of Yamraj was almost absent. Bapuji uses a striking phrase here — in Satyug, Yamraj is on vacation. The image is gentle and clear. The lord of death has nothing to do, because no one needs to be forced out of their body. The soul still carries enough strength. Ichha Mrityu continues to function in some measure. Lifespans are immense. Bapuji mentions that, as described in the scriptures of Sanatan Dharm, in Satyug the human lifespan was around one hundred thousand years.

It is worth pausing on this. A hundred thousand years. The human being today, at the very end of life's reach, hopes for a hundred. The difference between then and now is not merely a matter of years. It is a matter of soul power — of how strongly the soul could hold its body together, how purely it could maintain the elements within it.

It is important to note, as Bapuji clarifies, that this Satyug being spoken of here is not the present cycle of Satyug-Treta-Dwapar-Kalyug we are now within. This is a far older Satyug — the one that came at the very beginning of human existence, before the cycles repeated again and again. In that original Satyug, as told in the Sanatan Dharm tradition, the king Prithvi reigned for forty thousand years, and the people lived for a hundred thousand years. Even at such a stage, Yamraj was not needed to extract souls.

The change began in the middle of Treta. By the end of Treta, souls had fallen further. Their power had dimmed. Yamraj's work began. The system that had been created earlier now started to be put into active use. Through Dwapar and into Kalyug, the decline continued. Lifespans shortened. The soul's grip on the body weakened in a different way — it was now no longer the soul that held the body, but the body that held the soul. The role of Yamraj expanded.

Across cycles upon cycles — and Bapuji, through his deep yogic vision, speaks of nine hundred and thirty trillion years of this earth's history, with countless yug rotations within them — the system of death has been at work. Not always in the same form, not always with the same urgency, but always present once Treta began to close. With each yug cycle, partial and full pralays would also occur, but the system of death continued to function within the lives of the beings on earth.

◆ Bapuji Insight

"Satyug mein Yamraj ka vacation hota hai. Treta ke middle se aane lagta hai."

"In Satyug, Yamraj is on vacation. From the middle of Treta, he begins to come."

Chapter Eleven Souls Who Came as Travelers

There is a beautiful and quietly tragic note in Bapuji's account that deserves a chapter of its own. Not every soul that came to earth came because it had to. Many came simply because they wished to.

In the early times, when souls still carried great power, the universe was open to them. They could travel between lokas freely. The boundary between worlds was not sealed. A soul in a higher realm could decide, out of pure curiosity, to come down to this earth — to see what it was like, to walk through it, and to return.

Bapuji compares this to how some people today travel to the mountains for a holiday. They go to enjoy the experience, knowing they will come back home soon. In the same way, in those earlier times, souls would come down to earth as travelers — taking a kind of cosmic tour — with every intention of returning to their original loka.

But something happened to many of these visitors. Once they entered the physical world, once they took on a human form, they did not find their way back. The very thing that drew them — the experience of this earth — became the trap that held them. They became human. They lived. They formed attachments. And by the time they wished to return, they no longer had the power to do so.

This is a deeply moving teaching. It explains why so many souls find themselves on earth without a clear sense of belonging. They were never meant to stay. They came for a visit, and the visit became a long stay, and the long stay became a life, and the life became many lives. The way home was forgotten.

This pattern, repeated across countless souls, added to the population of earth and contributed to the very burden that made death's creation necessary. The travelers who never returned home became part of the very crowding that the system of death was finally established to address.

Chapter Twelve

The Search for Liberation

Once death came into existence, and once souls became aware that they were trapped in bodies they could not leave on their own, a new kind of search began on earth. Bapuji describes its origin clearly.

Many souls, even after losing their original power, still remembered something of their higher origin. They sensed, somewhere within, that they were not meant to remain bound. They longed to return to the soul's original divine home, to rise upward toward their true source. But how?

The knowledge of how to depart was no longer available to them. The soul that had once known by its own nature how to withdraw itself from the body had forgotten this art entirely. There was no method, no teacher, no technique that could be passed on, because the very ability had been lost from within.

This longing — the longing to leave, the longing for moksh — gave rise to a particular class of seekers. They went into forests. They sat in solitude. They began deep tapasya, spiritual effort. They became known as rishis and munis.

Bapuji notes that the rishis and munis came later. They were not present in the very earliest creation. They appeared once the descent had progressed far enough that humans had become trapped in bodies and were searching for a way out. Their entire effort — the meditations, the austerities, the disciplines that became the foundation of much of what we now call yoga and spirituality — arose precisely because the soul had forgotten its original capacity.

This places the entire spiritual tradition in a new light. It is not that humans always had to meditate and undertake tapasya to leave the body. Once, the soul left freely. The whole tradition of seeking moksh, of sitting in austerities, of knocking on the door of liberation, came into being only after the door of natural exit had closed.

In other words — the existence of the spiritual seeker on earth is itself a sign that something was lost long ago. The seeker exists because the soul forgot. The seeker's whole effort is to remember.

Chapter Thirteen Death in the Animal Kingdom

The following account presents the animal kingdom and its order as Bapuji has explained it within the spiritual cosmology of Sanatan Dharm. It is a spiritual perspective offered alongside, and not in conflict with, the observations of modern natural science.

A natural question arises when one looks at the system of death in human beings. What about the animals? Are they too brought to Yamlok by Yamdoots? Is there an account kept of their actions?

Bapuji answers this directly. The system of Yamraj does not extend to the animal kingdom. Animals do not fall under the work of Yamdoots. There is no chitragupt-like accounting for them in the same way.

But then how does balance hold among animals? Their numbers also grew. Their bodies too needed an end. If no Yamdoot came for them, what arrangement governed their lives and their deaths?

The answer Bapuji gives is striking in its simplicity. A different system was created for animals — the food chain. As animals multiplied, another animal was created to eat them. When that second animal also multiplied, a third was made to eat the second. When the third grew in number, a fourth followed. This cycle of predator and prey expanded outward, layer upon layer, until it covered the entire animal kingdom.

This is what we recognise today as the food chain — but Bapuji places it in a deeper context. It is not merely a biological accident. It was a deliberate arrangement, made to handle the same problem in the animal world that Yamraj was made to handle in the human world. Where humans had a forced extraction by Yamdoots, animals had a natural balance through predation. The result, in both cases, was the same — population was controlled, the burden on earth was managed, and the cycle of life and death continued.

Different systems, different forms, but the same underlying purpose. Wherever creation expanded too quickly to be sustained, an arrangement was set in place to bring it back into balance. For animals, that arrangement was the predator-prey cycle. For humans, it was Yamraj.

Chapter Fourteen

Death in Modern Times

Where does humanity stand today? Bapuji turns this same lens upon our present age, and the picture is sobering.

Iccha Mrityu — the conscious departure that once defined human life — is now almost nowhere to be found. The capacity for it has been lost. The soul has descended so far into tamopradhan that the original power required for voluntary exit is no longer accessible. The body holds the soul in its grip, often for far longer than the soul or the body itself would naturally desire.

Bapuji points to one consequence of this — the modern condition of prolonged physical decline that has become widespread in our times. Many bodies remain bound to life long after natural vitality has dimmed. Why does the soul's release not arrive at its natural moment?

The reason, Bapuji explains, is karma bandhan — the bondage of accumulated karmic accounts. So much remains in their record, so many threads of past actions remain unfinished, that the body cannot be released. And in the present cycle, even the system of Yamraj appears unable to act with its earlier ease. The natural moment of release is often delayed, because the system itself is now caught in the heaviness of the times.

This is what Bapuji has said about death in this age. The same system that was set up to free souls from bodies they could no longer leave has, in our own time, become so weighted that it does not function as it once did. The body lingers beyond its natural span. The soul waits. The system of death itself struggles under the load of so many incomplete karmic accounts.

The contrast with the original creation is total. Where once a soul left freely, by sankalp, in a body of supreme elements — now souls remain bound to bodies of dense earth and water. The journey from the deathless world to the present condition of humanity is the long arc that this book has traced.

And the change continues. Bapuji notes that everything on earth shifts over time. The age of kingdoms has passed; democracy has spread across the world. Such transformations on earth, he reminds us, do not begin on earth. They originate in the subtle realms — in the sukshma lok — and slowly express themselves in the visible world. The body of the world, like the body of the human, follows what happens at finer levels first.

Chapter Fifteen

The Cycles of Pralay

Within the long arc of creation, alongside the cycle of birth and death, runs another cycle — the cycle of pralay (cosmic dissolution) Bapuji places this gently into the picture, so that the larger rhythm of existence becomes visible.

After every full rotation of the four yugas — Satyug, Treta, Dwapar, and Kalyug — a partial dissolution occurs. This is called ardh pralay. The cycle does not simply continue endlessly. It is closed off and refreshed. Beyond this, Bapuji speaks of pralay itself — a fuller dissolution after many such cycles. And beyond even that, kalp pralay — the great dissolution that comes at the close of one of Brahma's days, when the three worlds and the seven nether realms are dissolved together. And finally, far above all of these, mahakalp pralay — the great great dissolution, when the entire brahmand itself, at the end of Brahma's full hundred years of life, is reabsorbed into its source.

Each pralay is a kind of resetting. Each one closes a chapter and opens another. None of them is final, because creation arises again. But they remind us that nothing within this physical realm is permanent. Even the systems that govern this realm — the lokas, the worlds, the very cycles of yugas — themselves come to an end and begin again.

Across nine hundred and thirty trillion years of this earth, as revealed in Bapuji's yogic vision, countless yug cycles have rotated, countless pralays have come and gone. The earth has not been created only once. The arrangements upon it — including the arrangement of death — have been laid down and dissolved many times over.

What does this teach us about death? It teaches us that even death, the system, is not absolute. It belongs to a particular configuration of creation. When that configuration ends, death too dissolves with it, awaiting the next arrangement. Death is bound by time. The soul is not.

This brings us, finally, to the most important truth that this entire book has been pointing toward.

Chapter Sixteen The Ultimate Truth: The Soul Is Immortal

The whole journey of this book — from the first formless Shiv, through the descent into bodies, through the loss of soul power, through the establishment of Yamraj and the rise of yug cycles, through the long ages and pralays — leads, in the end, to one simple recognition.

Death is not the truth of the soul. Death is the truth of the body.

Bapuji has given us the architecture, brick by brick, so that this single sentence can be understood not as a slogan but as a fact verified by every step of the journey. Death was created. It had a beginning. It came after life had been going on without it for ages. It was put in place to address a specific decline — the decline of the soul's own power to leave the body. The system of Yamraj, Yamdoots, Chitragupt, Swarg, Narak — all of this came later. None of it touches the soul itself.

The soul, in its original nature, was made of param prakash — supreme divine light. That light has not been extinguished. It has been covered. It has been forgotten. It has been overlaid by layers of body, of attachment, of karmic accounts. But it has not been destroyed. The soul that came to earth as a traveler, the soul that became a human, the soul that has now lived through countless births — this soul remains, in its inmost essence, exactly what it always was.

Death cannot reach this soul. Death only reaches the body that the soul wears. When death comes, what dies is not you. What dies is what you have been wearing.

This is not a piece of comfort offered against the fear of dying. It is a precise spiritual statement, established by the entire history of creation as Bapuji has described it. The soul is immortal because it predates death. It existed before death was created. It will exist after every system of death dissolves.

To know this — really to know this, not merely to repeat it — is to begin to step back into the original truth of one's being. It is to begin, in some small measure, to remember what the early souls of this earth knew without having to remember. It is to begin the long return journey toward what was always there beneath the layers.

Bapuji has placed before us the map. The reading of it is one thing. The walking of it is another. But the first step is taken in the recognition itself.

Death was born. The soul was not.

Glossary

The following Hindi and Sanskrit terms appear throughout the book. Their meanings are given here in simple form, as a quiet companion to the reader. For the deepest understanding, the reader is encouraged to also explore Bapuji's other discourses.

Atma — The soul; a point of conscious energy. The true self. Not the body, but that which makes the body alive. In its original state, it shines as pure divine light.

Param Atma — The supreme soul; the creator of souls. The soul in its highest state, with the power to create many souls through sankalp.

Param Prakash — Supreme divine light. The original luminous form of the soul before it descends into form.

Param Tatva — Supreme element. The finest, subtlest substance from which the early divine creation was made — Param Akash, Param Vayu, Param Agni.

Tatva — Element. The five physical elements — earth, water, fire, air, and ether — that compose the visible world.

Param Purush — The first divine male being created in any creation. A being with a supreme subtle form and immense soul power.

Param Prakriti — The divine feminine counterpart of Param Purush, brought forth from within him.

Sankalp — Determination, resolve, the power of pure thought through which a soul brings forth creation or makes a decision. Mind power in its true form.

Brahmand — The solar system or world-system created by Shiv.

Loka — A layer or dimension of creation. There are higher lokas and lower lokas, each occupying a different level of subtlety.

Shiv — The formless or formed creator of a solar system. In his Nirakar (formless) state, he is the supreme source. In his Akari (with form) state, he initiates creation.

Shakti — The divine feminine energy that arises from Akari Shiv to assist in further creation.

Vishnu — The great preserver, brought forth by the union of Shiv and Shakti.

Brahma — The creator who emerges from Vishnu's navel and brings forth the early world through sankalp.

Farishta — Angel-like beings of the early param tatva creation, before the descent into denser forms.

Devta — Divine beings of the higher realms who exist in the world of three elements — ether, air, and fire.

Avyakt — The unmanifest, subtle form of creation, invisible to the physical eye.

Vyakt — The manifest, visible form of creation, made of the five gross elements.

Ichha Mrityu — A rare yogic siddhi of voluntary departure from the body, attained only by divine beings of the highest spiritual realisation in the earliest ages of creation. Such souls, while supremely powerful, could leave the body through their own conscious resolve, without the need for any agent of death. This is not a practice or technique available to modern humans.

Mrityu — Death; the system of forced separation of the soul from the body, established when souls could no longer depart on their own.

Yamraj — The lord of death, established by Brahma to take souls from bodies they could no longer leave by their own power.

Yamlok — The realm of judgement, where souls are taken after death for accounting and decision.

Yamdoot — Messengers of Yamraj who carry out the act of separating soul from body and bringing the soul to Yamlok.

Chitragupt — The cosmic accountant who maintains the record of every soul's karma in his ledgers, the chaupde.

Karma — Action; and the consequence of action. Each action of a soul leaves an impression that follows the soul across lives.

Karma Bandhan — The bondage created by accumulated karmic accounts, which prevents the soul from leaving the body even when natural release would be welcome.

Swarg — Heaven; the upper realm where souls with positive karmic accounts experience the fruits of their good actions for a limited time.

Narak — Hell; the lower realm where souls experience the consequences of their wrong actions.

Yug — An age. The four yugas — Satyug, Treta, Dwapar, and Kalyug — repeat in cycles, each lasting a specific span of years.

Satyug — The age of truth; the highest of the four yugas, when souls are most pure, lifespans are longest, and Yamraj has little role to play.

Treta — The second yuga; the descent begins, and the work of Yamraj starts in its later half.

Dwapar — The third yuga; soul power continues to weaken and the system of death becomes more active.

Kalyug — The fourth and present yuga; the age of greatest descent, where lifespan is shortest and souls remain bound to dense bodies.

Moh — Attachment; the gripping of the soul to the body and to physical things, which prevents conscious departure.

Tamopradhan — Predominantly tamasic; a state of darkness, ignorance, and inertia. The soul in this state has lost much of its original power.

Satopradhan — Predominantly satvic; a state of purity, peace, and clarity. The original state of a pure soul.

Rajopradhan — Predominantly rajasic; a state of activity, desire, and acquisition. The middle state through which the soul passes during descent.

Tapasya — Spiritual effort; the disciplined practice undertaken by seekers to regain inner power and seek liberation.

Rishi — A spiritual seeker who undertakes deep tapasya in pursuit of higher truth.

Muni — A silent sage who, like the rishi, devotes himself to inner realisation.

Moksh — Liberation from the cycle of birth and death; the freeing of the soul from the bondage of the body.

Ardh Pralay — Partial dissolution that occurs after the completion of a full cycle of four yugas.

Pralay — A larger dissolution that follows many cycles of ardh pralay.

Kalp Pralay — The great dissolution that occurs at the end of one day of Brahma, dissolving the three worlds and the seven nether realms.

Mahakalp Pralay — The greatest dissolution, occurring at the end of Brahma's full lifespan of one hundred years, when the entire brahmand returns to its source.

Paramdham — The supreme abode; the highest dimension of a creation, where the entire creation is in supreme divine light form. The original incorporeal home of the soul.

Behad — Limitless, boundless, infinite. Used to describe the highest knowledge and the highest realms of creation.

Behad ki Atma — A soul of limitless dimension, constituted of param prakash and param maha tatva. A very powerful soul.

Sukshma Lok — The subtle world; the realm of subtle elements, finer than the visible physical world.

Sthool Jagat — The gross or physical world; the world of five elements visible to the physical senses.

Yog — Connection; the deep inward connection of the soul with the supreme. In this state, the soul is absorbed in its source.

Param Shanti — Supreme peace; the original state of the soul when first created. The state the soul forever seeks to return to.

Sanatan Dharm — The eternal way; the original spiritual tradition that has existed since the beginning of creation and continues without end.
